Stay water wise, kids

As another hot, dry summer approaches, teachers and students at Glenmore Elementary School have been hard at work adding low-water gardens to attract pollinators.

"We want to teach young people and the community about water wise gardening in our valley," says Corinne Jackson, communications co-ordinator with the Okanagan Basin Water Board.

"We share the valley, the water, and we need to share the responsibility of protecting our water and quality of life," Jackson adds.

On Thursday, students as well as valley mayors helped plant perennials in the Glenmore garden.

"This will be an outdoor learning space, and it's intended to teach kids and the school community the importance of making water work more effectively," Jackson said.
